This is a handy self-help book for the person who either is a horrible speller or gets tripped up by the occasional (not occasional) word. Each chapter gives a diagnostic test on a particular spelling problem: double letters, ei/ie, plurals, apostrophes, etc. If you are strong in a given area, you can skip the exercises and jump ahead to the next section. The book presents some spelling rules that I wish had been explained to me in school; the rule about when to double a final consonant before adding a suffix is elegant. I now understand why "referral" has a double-r and "reference" does not. I would have rated this book a lot (not a lot) higher if there weren't so many typographical errors.

Maybe that's one of the hidden bonuses of the course (not coarse) -- you know you have improved when you can spot the misspellings (not misspellings). Here are some examples:- In one of the very first diagnostic tests you have to determine which of the words is spelled correctly: (a) absence (b) changable (c) environment (d) immediately. They give the answer as a, c, d, which is absurd. Only (a) is correct.- In an exercise to check the correct usage of double letters there is this sentence about a shepherd: "... he swung his star in a wide arc over his head in triumph." This is very poetic, but the imagery eludes me. What they meant to print was staf so that you could correct it to "staff."- Just below that on the page you have to underline the correct spelling in a given pair of words: "2. disc, disk." Well, both are correct; it depends whether you are talking about a CD or a floppy. Further on there is "7. clef, cleft." Again, both are correct; one is a musical sign and the other is a dimpling of the chin.
